

Our Story

In 1950, William Douglas Cook, founder of Eastwoodhill, our national arboretum, was looking for land to grow rhododendrons. He found an ideal site, a 26-hectare block of heavily logged bush high on a saddle between Taranaki Maunga and the Kaitake Ranges. Renowned Taranaki businessman and horticulturist Russell Matthews (later Sir Russell Matthews K.B. O.B.E), then brought his own passion to the project, enlisting the financial support of 23 other rhododendron enthusiasts from around New Zealand. In 1951, together they established the Pukeiti Rhododendron Trust (PRT).

The PRT's founding goals were: to encourage interest in and development of genus Rhododendron, along with scientific research into its breeding and culture; to act as a common meeting ground for enthusiasts; and to conserve and provide sanctuary for the garden's native flora and fauna.

Today, the garden encompasses 360 hectares, holding nearly 300 taxa from the genus Rhododendron, and with more than 21 kilometres of walkways through New Zealand's native rainforest. Although the Taranaki Regional Council now manages the garden day-to-day, we still hold true to our original purpose, maintaining a close partnership with the TRC and contributing practically and financially to conserve and grow Pukeiti's unique plant collection. We also actively provide leadership and expertise to national and global conservation networks and programmes working to conserve species Rhododendron.
